The rise of public to private transactions

UK takeover offers

The interest of private equity investors in public companies has been on the rise over recent years. Of course, the public to private ('PTP') is nothing new and has been around for many years with waves of activity levels. The financial crisis of 2008-09 reduced private equity investing in both private and public companies. The takeover of Cadbury by Kraft Foods in 2010 caused the Takeover Panel to revamp its rules with the removal of inducement fees and the introduction of further put up or shut up measures. For a while that made private equity more wary of public company deals until new norms were understood and interest picked up again.

Throughout those years however most takeovers were still led by strategic buyers. 2019 was different in that nearly half of takeovers were PTP deals. That trend looked set to continue into 2020 until COVID-19 had a dampening impact on takeovers and M&A in general.

COVID-19 caused capital market valuations to be hit hard with a 20% fall in March 2020 making many public companies look more attractive in value terms. That lost ground was quickly recovered over the remainder of 2020 with growth in 2021 before a decline in 2022.

2022 saw the number of PTPs falling to the lowest level since 2014, however this was reversed in 2023 with more than three times the number of PTPs announced in total in 2022. 2024 to end of October has seen a steady number of PTP transactions, nearly half of all firm offers.

We expect this interest from private equity to remain as capital market values and liquidity for many companies remains low. Public companies with their ease of research should continue to figure prominently in private equity sights.

Private equity Trade

Private equity interested in both main market and AIM companies

Comparing main market listed companies with AIM companies, the share price movement chart on opposite shows that although AIM prices performed slightly better during most of 2021, AIM prices have been in decline since 2022, tracking well below the FTSE All Share Index.

It is noticeable that where PTPs were historically focused on the main market, private equity interest in AIM companies has been growing. We would attribute this in part to the growing size and quality of companies on AIM which are of greater interest to private equity. 2023 saw double the amount of AIM PTP transactions compared to the main market. This is likely due to the relative lower value of AIM companies. 2024 has seen a similar amount of both main market and AIM PTP transactions to date. Following the recent Budget announcement and changes to inheritance tax ('IHT') for AIM companies, we expect more interest in AIM companies going forward. Many retail investors have been attracted to AIM for the IHT benefits it offered but as this benefit is to be reduced there could be investors looking to sell.

AIM prices tracked All Share for most of 2021 but have significantly fallen behind over the last three years.

There is a spread across sectors but with a leaning to asset light businesses

Looking at sectors there has been a fairly wide spread of public to private deals, matching the wider investment focus of many private equity investors.

Over the last five years the sectors that attracted the most interest were computing and electronic equipment, financial and insurance and support services with an increased number of transactions in the travel and leisure and pharmaceuticals sectors in 2023. There has been a leaning towards sectors and businesses that have a greater services element to their business model and more of an asset light balance sheet.

Bid premiums are higher than historic levels

Takeovers of public companies have traditionally been priced as a premium to the prevailing share price. The conventional wisdom being a standard premium of 30% which has varied as underlying earnings based multiples have moved up and down with market price movements. It was once considered that a management buyout of a public company should command a higher premium but we believe it is now more to do with the traditional dynamics of M&A, based on the interested parties and underlying multiples at the time.

Looking at the quarterly premiums for takeover offers (including PTP deals) over the last few years, they have varied widely between around 30% and 90%. The diagram includes both the premiums for one month and one day before the announcement of an offer. The one month is often thought to be a better guide to the premium as the share price sometimes edges up the closer to a deal which compresses the one day premium a bit. In times of declining stock markets it can of course go the other way. The average one month and one day premium across the period shown was 40% and 45% representively.

Buy side factors

So why have we seen an increasing interest by private equity in acquiring public companies? As the number of private equity players has grown along with the amount of available capital to deploy, the supply of funds has been looking for good companies of the right size to invest in. Debt is generally still available, albeit the cost of debt has increased and some sectors may have lower appeal for lenders.

The added transparency of public companies in terms of reporting, disclosure and investment research makes them easier for deal origination teams to do their analysis than with more opaque private companies.Moreover, for the right price most institutional shareholders are often willing to entertain an offer.

We also believe that as private equity has developed, many investors have become willing to look at more complicated deals that could put rival buyers off.

Management factors

For management teams running public companies, there may come a point where the capital markets are not working for them as well as they once did. Capital markets evolve and the size threshold of a company to attract the full range of investors tends to go up over time. Having a publicly traded share price can be a benefit when it is rising or an impediment when it is falling or being volatile. Many smaller public companies suffer from a lack of investment research and liquidity which can hamper the share price.

The costs of maintaining a listing can be high both in terms of the monetary cost and the amount of management time spent speaking to a wider range of investors. We have seen a rise in shareholder activism which can be a distraction and difficult to deal with. The added public disclosure and need to announce negative changes as well as positive developments can be unhelpful for management. At times when looking to make acquisitions, the funding availability may be uncertain or not there and the listing or AIM rules can restrict flexibility for acquirers in a process.

There can be an attraction to swapping a wider shareholder base for one supportive private equity investor. Added to that the ability to agree and deliver a strategy and business plan over time with more flexibility and certainty of additional funding support when needed.

How public to private deals work...

A different risk profile to acquiring a private company

Acquiring a public company can be very different from acquiring a private company. The sale and purchase agreement is replaced by an offer document or scheme of arrangement document that contains little in the way of warranty and indemnity protection and there is no concept of exclusivity. Deals by their very nature are much more public once they reach an announcement stage than a private deal.

Governed by a framework and a regulator

Most UK public companies are subject to the Takeover Code (the 'Code') which is operated by the Takeover Panel (the 'Panel'). The Code or blue book as it was often referred to, is based around six general principles and a series of more detailed rules for an orderly framework in which to conduct takeovers. The principles include equality of treatment of shareholders and avoiding creating a false market in the shares. The Panel itself is made up of a permanent Executive and a number of secondees from banks, law firms and accountancy firms.

The approach and the implication of early announcements

The Code places a large importance on secrecy and the approach to a public company and on monitoring the share price for any untoward movements and the press for any leaks. Before an approach this is the responsibility of the potential bidder and the Panel expects to be consulted where needed and may require a form of announcement of interest. Tactically, this is important for a private equity bidder as it may find itself being named before it is ready. Private equity bidders should do as much desk top research as they can to decide on their interest and pricing strategy.

After an approach, the same monitoring rules apply and a leaks announcement could still be required, naming the interested party and starting a four week put up or shut up period (although there are exemptions where there is a formal sale process similar to a private company auction process). Again, tactically it is crucial that a private equity bidder makes every effort to ensure confidentiality and secrecy to guard against the situation becoming public ahead of time.

The independent directors and financial advice

The target company will need to be prepared to grant permission to management to have discussions and explore a deal. It will need to appoint an independent committee of directors and take its own financial advice (the so called Rule 3 advisor) on the terms of any offer. The private equity bidder would be looking to agree terms to secure a recommendation of its offer to shareholders.

Due diligence and deal protections

Once a headline price has been agreed, it is possible to do as much due diligence as on a private deal. The Code however does include an equality of information requirement for other interested parties which in practice may present some concerns. The management financial plan also needs to be shared with the independent directors and Rule 3 advisor as part of their assessment.

The extent to which a buyer can complete due diligence varies significantly and some of the usual diligence focus items, like net debt and working capital are less relevant to price. The key is understanding the level of access available, which often increases as the deal becomes more certain, and phasing the work appropriately.

In contrast to a private deal, there is no disclosure exercise and no warranty protection which increases the need for adequate due diligence. A private equity bidder can include terms and conditions to invoke an offer but in practice the Panel would only allow them to be invoked in very limited circumstances. Inducement or break-fees are not permitted, save in the case of a formal sale process.

Unlike a private deal, any completion mechanism needs to be covered in due diligence as there is no opportunity for a post offer working capital true up. The costs of the target company are borne by the bidder rather than the selling shareholders and factored into the pricing and returns analysis.

In our experience, a bespoke and flexible approach to due diligence works best, hitting the key value areas early and evolving as more information becomes available.

... and navigating the takeover code

Exit considerations

Could another IPO be a possible exit option for the private equity investor? It is possible but the company would need to look different in terms of size. This could be viable for a buy and build play or a restructuring away from the spotlight of the market. More likely, the exit would be sale to a strategic investor or a secondary private equity deal.

Management incentives

There are restrictions on management rollover and incentives under the Code. Generally these would be subject to Rule 3 advice and an independent shareholder vote in addition to the wider shareholder acceptance of an offer.

Financing the offer

As with usual private equity deals, it is possible to use bank debt but the banks will have an interest in the acceptance level in order to obtain their security on the assets of the target. A public company is not able to provide financial assistance and therefore will need to be de-listed and re-registered as a private company. This needs a special resolution or 75% of the votes in favour but in theory could be blocked by an objecting 5% shareholder.

With a contractual offer, the 90% acceptance condition may become more important as it allows the squeeze out provisions to be applied. In practice that may well align with a private equity bidder seeking to gain full control. Increasingly, a scheme of arrangement has been used which binds at 75% of votes by value representing 50% in number.

The Code also requires a cash confirmation statement for which the Panel holds the financial advisor to the bidder responsible.

Irrevocable undertakings and share purchases

It is possible to seek the support of the larger shareholders in the target company to accept an offer. Most will not wish to be made insiders too early as it will restrict their ability to deal and there are announcement implications and mandatory offer implications under Rule 9 for a bidder to consider. The gathering of irrevocable support is therefore usually left to just prior to a firm intention to announce and after all due diligence has been completed. Most institutional shareholders will only provide a soft irrevocable with a price hurdle in case of a higher competing offer post announcement.

It is also possible to purchase shares subject to insider trading restrictions but there are a number of Code implications and practical considerations.

Intentions for the target company

The Code places a requirement for the bidder to set out its intentions for the target business, employees and locations and for the independent directors to comment on. In practice this may be more of an issue for a strategic bidder wishing to make changes than a private equity bidder backing a management team's business plan for growth. The Code requires consultation by the target company with employee representatives and any pension trustees.

The Code also requires some level of disclosure on the private equity bidder and for one or more of its partners or directors to take public responsibility for some of the information included in the offer document.

Competing bidders

As the Code does not allow for exclusivity it is possible for a competing strategic bidder to get involved at any point after a leaks announcement or a firm offer announcement. This reinforces the need for secrecy, preparation, irrevocable support and speed of execution.
